Good Morning Narwhals!

The rain has stopped, and the trees/plants are really starting to bloom.

Yesterday, the governor of Pennsylvania declared that schools will stay out of session for longer than he had first anticipated to slow the spread of the Corona virus.

Our return to school date is now April 14th.

In her communication last night, our superintendent, Dr. Lonardi, stated that we are to begin "new instruction" starting this coming Monday. That means, rather than reinforcing skills, we will be moving forward in teaching and assessing NEW ones (remotely) starting next week.

As more information becomes available to us, I'll share it here.

If you are looking for a new idea to try while we are being told to stay at home, try keeping a daily journal. Since up to this current situation, your parents and grandparents have not experienced a time like this, I would anticipate that you may never experience one like this again either.

This will be a time that you will remember in the future, and it would be cool to have a first-hand account, written in your twelve year-old handwriting, that your future fifty year-old self can read from, it will also help you to think about your current situation and process your thoughts.

Have a great day kids!
